If you need medical care that is not provided by your insurance, or if your insurance provider does not cover the total cost, your medical service provider may offer a medical credit card as a solution. Medical credit cards can be used to cover Lasik or other vision procedures, cosmetic surgery, dental work, veterinary services, or other expensive procedures that cannot close out of pocket. Medical credit cards are not large credit cards, such as credit cards with visa or MasterCard logos. Limited-use credit cards are similar to retail credit cards. This shows that these cards can only be used to cover medical services and only when the service provider accepts that payment method. Make sure that the card you are applying for can be used for the service you receive. You can't use it credit card for other purchases. For some people, this creates limited use tempting to pay for unnecessary medical services since they know that medical credit cards will offer ease of payment over time. Because they are credit products, medical credit cards require credit checking. As with other credit cards, you have to make an application and if you don't meet your credit qualifications you may be rejected. Paying on time is important to make sure your credit is not affected. Some medical credit cards require you to repay the balance within a certain period of time, rather than making small minimum payments toward your balance. Reimbursement terms are usually short, ranging from 6 to 36 months. However, some medical credit cards offer repayment times for procedures that are up to 60 months more expensive. Many medical credit cards offer 0% interest for an entry period, but you have a catch with these offers. The promotion is actually a very different deferred interest agreement on the 0% promotional offer. You see with other major credit cards, with a deferred interest promotion, you have to pay the full balance before the promotion period ends to get a 0% interest deal. Otherwise, if any of the balance remains after the promotional period, your account will be hit with retroactive interest from the first transaction. Depending on the balance and interest rate, your balance may be hundreds of dollars higher. Late payment penalties can be harsh – if you miss only one payment, you will not only pay a late payment fee, but you will also lose your promotional interest rate; interest will begin immediately. Deferred interest is not such a bad deal as long as you understand that this is what you are signing up for and you can pay the balance before the interest-free period ends. However, this is not always the case. In 2013, the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau requested GE Capital reimburse up to $34.1 million in interest payments to consumers who had not been correctly disclosed about the deferred interest terms. (GE Capital has since changed its name to Syncrhony Financial.) Do the math before accepting a deferred interest promotion. Divide the price of your services by the number of months during the promotional period and consult your budget to decide whether you can realistically meet these payments. If payments are difficult to make, there is a good chance that you will not be able to pay the balance until the deferred period expires. Medical debt is a problem in the United States and putting medical services on your credit card can make your debt even worse. A common problem with medical credit cards is that they are always fully encouraged by medical staff who are not fully aware of the terms and conditions credit cards. Too often, patients are left without the cost information needed to make an informed decision. And since medical staff directly promote credit cards, patients can believe they are signing up for an on-premises payment plan with the medical office instead of opening a new credit card account. This fact may have led the patient to turn down the offer. Think of medical credit cards as carefully as any other credit card – perhaps even more because you'll be using them right away. It is especially important that you read small articles before signing up for a credit card to assess any private financing, regular APR, fees, late payment penalties, etc. Before accepting a credit card, make sure you want all these details from your service provider. Weigh in against your other options before making the final decision. If you have to put the medical procedure on plastic, you do not have to use the credit card offered by the medical office staff. As long as you have enough credit, you can use a credit card that you already have. You can even apply for a credit card with a zero percent promotional APR on purchases. If you qualify, this will be a real zero percent interest agreement – only the remaining balance after the promotional period will be charged interest at the normal rate. Another medical credit card may be able to use one with better terms. Check with your credit card and medical service provider to see if this option will work. You can also request a payment plan from your provider, even if it means upfront payment in installments. You may be able to take advantage of household capital or medical distress cases, or you may be able to make a penalty-free withdrawal of 401k. Just make sure you understand and accept what you're signing up for. Pay the balance as soon as possible to reduce the interest you pay and, if any, to ensure that you pay within the deferred interest period. A.
